RESEARCH INTERESTS

I have worked for more than 20 years in the field of climate and global change impacts on marine populations (especially zooplankton), including interdisciplinary connections between biological oceanography, physical oceanography, and climatology. In particular, my research has focused on the impacts of climate oscillations on marine biodiversity, tipping points, and marine ecological shifts. These abrupt changes involve entire ecosystems, often modifying ecosystem services and carrying high societal impacts. Given the current global change scenarios, it is likely that there will be more abrupt shifts in the coming decades (<https://www.nature.com/articles/s41558-019-0420-1>), thus there is need to foresee and adapt to them. I am currently interested in linking shifts in marine ecosystems and societies, and climate change science to policy actions. Additional interests include coastal management, social-ecological relationships, climate change advocacy and the intersection between art and scientific research.
